OPINION

Bedol's 'bodabil'

EDITORIAL

OF ALL THE ABSURDITIES OF THE MAY 14 ELECtions, perhaps the most absurd is the behavior of the Maguindanao election supervisor, Lintang Bedol. Perhaps in time his name will enter the language. The only question is, what will it stand for?

Breathtaking shamelessness? Bedol finally appeared before the Commission on Elections on June 13, but without any of the election documents the Comelec demanded (and the country wanted) to see.

Ridiculously incredible claim-making? That day, he blithely told the Comelec (and for the first time) that the election documents the commissioners wanted to inspect had been stolen two weeks earlier.

What is this, political slapstick? Unfortunately for all of us, there are other numbers in his vaudeville act.

After Maguindanao produced an incredible 12-0 Team Unity sweep, improbably led by Ilocos Sur Gov. Chavit Singson, Bedol went into hiding. Only the threat of imminent arrest by the Comelec forced him to surface.

Facing the media, he denied that he had, in fact, gone into hiding. He failed to appear before the Comelec convened as the National Board of Canvassers on May 30, he said, because he had not received a subpoena. "It would be wrong for a field officer to come to Manila without a copy of a directive or a subpoena because you would not be able to reimburse your expenses," he said. He did not explain, however, why he had to wait for a subpoena. Isn't it part of his job, when the Comelec commissioners, his own superiors, directed him to make the trip to Manila, to take the next flight out of the province?

Bedol also denied that election fraud marred the vote in Maguindanao. He said the elections were "generally peaceful," and attributed the victory of administration candidates at both national and local levels to the lack of opposition. Candidates in 20 of the 22 municipalities ran unopposed, he said. (He did not mention that 19 candidates for the Senate received zero votes.) He could not describe, however, exactly how the Maguindanao elections were conducted, since he was supervising the polls in another province on election day. He even mistakenly denied that poll clerk Faizal Kalamiongan, one of those who bravely spoke out against election fraud in Maguindanao, was an election inspector; his mistake, he finally admitted last Monday, was based on erroneous information.

Bedol also insisted that the provincial Certificates of Canvass were "duly executed." He could not support the provincial COCs with the municipal COCs and municipal Statements of Votes, however, because the documents got "lost," or were stolen (he is not exactly sure which), from his office on May 29. He could not explain why he did not report the loss or the theft earlier. But he immediately sought to place the blame on others. "It is possible it [the pile of documents] was taken by the same people who staged a protest at the provincial capitol," he added. "A case has to be filed for us to determine who is liable."

But isn't he, in fact, the one burdened with liability?

As Newsbreak has reported, Bedol collected all the election documents from the municipal election officers on May 28, ostensibly for safekeeping. This was not standard operating procedure; as the online magazine's source said, "We usually keep the copy of the election returns for the Municipal Board of Canvassers" for record-keeping purposes.

But collect all of them Bedol did. And the following day—when almost all of the municipal election officers were in Manila, waiting to appear before the Comelec—the documents all went missing.

It is difficult not to consider the possibility that the unusual step of collecting all the copies of the ERs was to make their loss, or their theft, that much easier to accomplish. Bedol made sure to keep the documents in his office, but his office had no lock! Bedol made sure to keep the documents in his office, but for some reason he did not arrange to have armed guards posted outside—on a day when protesters were demonstrating outside the provincial capitol, he said.

If you aren't laughing, that's because in Bedol's gaudy show the joke's on all of us.

Aguinaldo heirs creep into Cavite politics

By Marlon Ramos
Kawit, Cavite

MORE THAN A CENTURY AFTER Gen. Emilio Aguinaldo first unfurled the Philippine flag from the balcony of his house in Kawit to mark the country's independence and his reign as the country's first president, his heirs have been silently building what could be the next most influential political clan in the historic province of Cavite.

COUNTRY COOKING
Micky Fenix

A fine kettle of fish (books)

A LITTLE BOOK INTRODUCED ME TO ALAN Davidson. It was called "A Kipper with my Tea."

I suppose he gave, my husband, ... "Selected Food Essays," and ... thought this was the kind of book I would appreciate.

It was more than appreciated. It's one of my most valuable books, the one I would recommend to anyone who aspires to be a food writer.

His essay on the Filipino eating attitude, "Hello, Halo-Halo," endeared him to me right away. He called the attitude "tropical-sparkling sensibilities." [illegible]

Most people would remember the late Davidson as the editor of "The Oxford Companion to Food" and organizer of the Oxford Symposium on Food and Cookery. Two huge projects, certainly.

Yet his biggest contribution to the world of food must certainly be his works on seafood—identifying them, giving their various names in different countries, writing down how these were cooked.

Unofficial task

He started his "fish work" when he was assigned in Tunis in 1961 as a member of the British diplomatic corps. It wasn't part of his official duty but it was done to keep a promise to his wife to help in identifying the bewildering array of fish at the market and to write down the names in Arabic, French and Italian.

That resulted in a booklet on the sea fish of Tunisia. His introduction to ichthyology, the study of fishes, came from the expert on Mediterranean fish, professor Giorgio Bini.

That little book on Tunisian seafood later grew to be a bigger book on "Mediterranean Seafood." It was done with the help of another great British cookery writer, Elizabeth David, who saw the first book and persuaded her publishers to entice Davidson to do the expanded version.

While assigned on home duty, Davidson said the "fish in my life submerged." Luckily, he was assigned as ambassador to Laos in 1973. The assignment resulted in the book "Fish and Fish Dishes of Laos."

He was the first person to catalogue the fish and to describe the cookery of the nation. In "A Kipper with my Tea," he wrote about the giant catfish of the Mekong river, the Laotian pa beuk, a rare species that could be caught only for one month in a year and could measure more than three meters long and weigh over 250 kilos.

The fish is so mysterious because no one knows where it spawns. There are so many myths about it that certain rules have to be obeyed by fishermen while attempting to catch it, otherwise they believe they will be unable to catch one.

The rules include making the necessary offerings to certain spirits and to heed [illegible] each other while fishing.

Today any book by Davidson merits my attention and depletes my allowance. And so "Seafood of Southeast Asia" was quickly purchased as soon as I saw his name. It's the second edition; the first one was published in 1976.

The book has wonderful illustrations, so deftly done, though in black and white. The fish are easy to identify. But the book is more than just a catalogue. It also includes recipes of the nations that compose the region.

Every fish is listed with the scientific name and local names. It puzzled me at first that among Southeast Asian nations, Laos was not included in the local names listing. Then, I remembered that the country was landlocked, meaning it had no coast. Its fish is only from fresh water such as the mighty Mekong River where the pa beuk is found.

Chinese influence

Though not in Southeast Asia, China and Hong Kong are included in the recipe section. Davidson knew that Chinese cooking was so much a part of Southeast Asian cookery.

He also wrote in that book that the most common and most interesting fish were included. Of fish, since fish didn't adhere to man's political boundaries, the fish could also be found in East Asia, Red Sea and Persian Gulf.

I will have to look for his "North Atlantic Seafood." If they seem irrelevant to us, know like me that it's really the writing that interests me.

One of my pleasant surprises was looking through the tables in a bookstore and discovering "Seafood: A Connoisseur's Guide and Cookbook," a collaboration with artist Charlotte Knox.

The writer said he had a global selection in mind, having covered very specific regions in his fish books while the artist chose with her painter's eye. The result is a beautiful seafood book, each fish or shellfish looking so fresh and waiting to be cooked in the Asian, Mediterranean, North Atlantic or Scandinavian way.

When asked why he titled my little book "A Kipper with my Tea," Davidson wrote in the book's introduction that "High tea, Ponds style has always been, at least since the age of 6, my favorite meal. And I really like kippers." The kipper [illegible] salt and smoked.
